Development projects regularly experience difficulties or failures in their implementation. When a goal is not achieved, it is sometimes difficult to confess mistakes or, more importantly, the failure of the project.

Have the concerned organizations "the right to fail"? How can we avoid that failure is hidden away because of eventual negative consequences for the involved actors, and valorize such experiences as lessons to learn from?

Is it possible to identify the points, which require special attention during a project? How can we turn this taboo into recommendations for future projects ?

Location :

EXCO Daegu, 1st floor, B-400
